Bring Us the Hard Jobs

We have saved many automobile owners the trouble and expense of returning broken parts to the factory for repairs.

The fact that we are equipped to do welding on broken castings or can make new parts if necessary is a big asset to this community.

No matter what your trouble is, bring it in to us. Don't think that any job is too big for us. We have facilities that will surprise you. And our prices are exceptionally reasonable.

Give us a chance to figure on your smaller jobs, too—grinding valves, burning out carbon, etc. You will find us always able to please you.

SELLS LAND FOR MINOR

In the county court yesterday a sale was made for the estate of Gladys Sharp, a minor, through John Sharp, guardian, of thirty acres of land near the waterworks in the city limits for $1600.

GOES TO STATE FAIR

The very attractive township display of Tuttle, for which Mrs. J. Roy Sloan, who was in charge, was often complimented during the fair, will be sent on to the state fair at Oklahoma City. This is a most fitting arrangement of grains, fruits and vegetables which would do credit to any exposition in the country.

MARRIAGE LICENSES CHEAPER

It's cheaper to get married now than it was a month ago. "It's only $3 instead of $3.10 for the license now since the revenue stamp was taken off on the first of the month," said Miss Mabel Linda, deputy county clerk, who issued the following licenses today:

Clabe H. Carter, 21, Norge, and Josephine Olive Davidson, 18, Pocomasset; Claude Cheaves, 22, Duncan, and Miss Nona E. James, 18, Duncan.

MYSTERIOUS NEIGHBOR

By LOUISE OLIVER.

"Mrs. Green, what does Mr. Davis do for a living?"

"Why I don't know, Miss Wilson. He's just so nice his niceness seems to cover everything, and if I ever was curious about it I got over it long ago. Some folks have enough money without working."

"Yes, I know, but it seems so queer—the way he lives, I mean. Out all night, or at least until 2 and 3 o'clock, and sleeping any old time at all. My room is next to his and I can hear him come in."

Winifred dropped the argument without giving her real reason for inquiring. She, too, liked her merry, happy-go-lucky neighbor and she was afraid of doing him an injustice.

It had happened this way: The night before, while getting some copy ready to send in, the keys of her typewriter had locked. She tried to fix it, but things went wrong and before she knew it the whole affair was out of commission.

"Oh, pshaw!" she cried, pushing and tugging this way and that. "What shall I do? Carpenter won't be bothered with long hand and this has to be at the office in an hour."

Just then she heard a step in the hall. "There's Mr. Davis. I wonder if he can do anything?"

She flew to her door and opened it. "Mr. Davis!" she called. But he had entered his own room and was just shutting the door.

"Yes," he answered, instantly opening it again. "What can I do for you, Miss Wilson?"

And while Winifred was trying to explain her predicament, she was also trying hard not to betray the fact that she saw an automatic gun and some queer-looking instruments that he was in the act of transferring from his pocket to a table near the door.

"Certainly I'll come. I'm a regular Mr. Fixit. I was just thinking of hanging out a shingle. Typewriters Repaired While You Wait."

He was as good as his word and the typewriter was soon put into working trim again. When the door had closed, Winifred looked at the blank panels with her heart beating high and her cheeks strangely flushed.

Had she known it, Ed Davis, too, was looking back at the panels as though trying to conjure up another picture of her gray blue eyes, sweet, serious smile and color that came and went provokingly.

"Miss Wilson," called Carpenter next day, "here's a card to the Prides-Pamiston wedding. Suppose you go up there today and write things up. Give 'em a column."

Arrived at Valmondia, the home of the Prides, Winifred was given the permission of her hostess to wander where she would. Pavilions had been built on the lawn, tables put up around fountains and a wonderful arbor of flowers and vines erected for the ceremony.

Winifred was lost in the wonder of everything when she came face to face with Mr. Davis.

"You here?" she cried in surprise, not able to keep the amazement and pleasure out of her voice.

He looked nonplused for an instant, then smiled quickly. "Why not? Every one's here! You, too!"

"But I'm just here on business!"

"So am I, but keep it quiet!" he whispered.

She looked at his faultless cutaway, every detail of his attire. She could not understand this man.

That was the day the pearl collar was stolen, a gift from the Vincents to the bride.

Winifred, opening the paper to see her own account of the wedding next morning, read the great headline with dismay.

She let the paper fall to the floor and tried to collect her confused thoughts. Davis had come in about 4 o'clock and she had heard him up all the rest of the night. He had gone out early again without retiring. What had been his business at the wedding?

Dazed, she made her way along crowded streets to the office. She heard a boy cry. "The Poll Collar Found! Bravery of Detective Davis!" She bought a paper in frantic haste and there on the first page was a full-face cut of her neighbor. "Thank Heaven!" she breathed, crushing the paper to her breast. "I understand now!"

That night Winifred knocked timidly at her neighbor's door. He opened it and bowed.

"Blessed typewriter—it's broken again?"

"No," said Winifred, keeping in the shadow of the stairs to hide her burning face. "I came to congratulate you. I've been finding out all day what a wonderful person you are. And I've been taught at home when one has had wicked thoughts he ought to confess. I have been thinking awful things about you. I saw the gun and when the necklace was stolen—she did not finish."

"Hush, child! Every one thinks things about me," he said kindly. "I'm used to it. Get your hat and we'll go for some ice cream. I've something important to tell you. Something no one else must hear! You'll come, won't you?"

"Yes, indeed," she answered happily. "I just feel like celebrating."
